Abstract

The countries and societies of the present age face vast international opportunities and threats. Therefore, ensuring the survival of societies requires finding new solutions and methods. To achieve this goal, governments must turn to maps that are tailored to changing environmental conditions. Therefore, the issue of entrepreneurship and its development is raised as one of the plans of the government. Entrepreneurship is highly regarded by policy-makers because of its importance in creating employment and economic growth. In this re-gard, government policies in turn lead to the formation of an institutional environment in which entrepreneurial decisions are made. These policies are important for entrepreneurship, and these government policies and programs in entrepreneurship development can be produc-tive or destructive. In this article, we first discuss entrepreneurship and development and then examine entrepreneurship in several developed and developed countries.
